Nancy Zumkeller, CE Supervisor II, UCCE Fresno/Madera Counties
Nancy Zumkeller’s career with UC CalFresh Fresno/Madera Counties began 9 years ago as a part time program educator. She had been a stay at home mom for 13 years, so the transition back into the work force in a part-time capacity was the perfect fit for her. She has her Bachelor of Arts, from Fresno State, in Liberal Studies so her passion for education and supporting the health of families in her community felt like a natural fit. As her position gradually increased to full time, she was promoted to Program Coordinator and enjoyed taking on more responsibilities and leadership roles to bring the UC CalFresh key messages to the community. She has gained valuable experiences and knowledge while making strong connections within the population and agencies UCCE serves. She is proud to be a part of the UC CalFresh Fresno/Madera team, who she describes as an exceptional group of dedicated people. Nancy looks forward to her new role as program supervisor, contributing through staff development, and further enhancing Fresno/Madera County programs. In her spare time, Nancy enjoys spending time with her husband, son, and daughter while taking care of their garden, chickens, goats and many other projects and activities in which their kids are involved.

Haley Kerr, CESII, UCCE Alameda County
Haley Kerr comes to UC CalFresh from Miami, where she worked for almost 5 years in HIV Prevention at a healthcare center. Prior to Miami, she was living and working in Trujillo, Peru, overseeing a volunteer program in several communities. There, she worked with families, children, health centers, and schools to do education around nutrition, first aid, dental health, and other important topics.

She completed a Master’s program at Tulane University, focusing on social work and public health and doing practical work in HIV prevention. Before going to grad school, she worked as a Peace Corps Volunteer in Paraguay for 3 years. She was a Rural Health and Sanitation Volunteer in a small community for most of that time, working with the families living there to address their health needs including parasite prevention, dental health, nutrition, and clean water. She extended her service to work in the capital city of Asuncion, on a peer health education project.

From her work and school experiences, Haley carries a strong desire to help empower people to make healthier choices and make use of the resources they have in their communities, in a culturally competent and humble way. She is very excited to work in Alameda County and looks forward to learning more about this very diverse community. Haley will be leading UCCE Alameda’s GGG and CATCH efforts in 28 partner preschools. You can reach her at hbkerr@ucanr.edu.

Articles & Research
In-person education, provider training may reduce pediatric intake of sugar-sweetened beverages
Effective interventions for decreasing consumption of sugar-sweetened beverages among children aged 0 to 5 years often take place in preschool/daycare settings, include restricting physical access to beverages, involve in-person individual education, and offer provider training, according to a study published in Obesity Reviews.

“A robust body of literature links [sugar-sweetened beverage] consumption to negative health consequences including adiposity, dental caries, insulin resistance and caffeine-related effects,” Kelsey A. Vercammen, of the department of epidemiology at the Harvard T.H. Chan School of Public Health, Boston, and colleagues wrote in the study background.

“The association between [sugar-sweetened beverage] consumption and weight gain is particularly concerning given that childhood obesity often continues into adulthood, heightening the lifetime risk of morbidity and premature mortality from obesity-related diseases.”

In a systematic review, the researchers analyzed 27 studies assessing interventions designed to reduce sugar-sweetened beverage consumption and documenting child sugar-sweetened beverage consumption as an outcome conducted between January 2000 and December 2017.

Included studies evaluated the sugar-sweetened beverage consumption of children via parent-reported measures. Additionally, seven studies used a 24-hour recall, eight used a food frequency questionnaire, five used a validated questionnaire, five used a questionnaire that was not validated, one used a food diary and one used a mobile tracking system.

Eight of the 27 studies reported sugar-sweetened beverage intake as a primary outcome, and three based their sample size calculation on identifying changes in sugar-sweetened beverage consumption. Most studies (n = 18) analyzed several behaviors or lifestyle factors, including diet, physical activity, sleep habits, oral hygiene and use of media, such as television.

Researchers found that several interventions resulted in a successful reduction of sugar-sweetened beverage consumption among young children, including interventions conducted in the preschool or daycare settings (four of five successful studies) and in-person individual education, teaching children and parents about sugar-sweetened beverage reduction (nine out of 14 successful studies). Other successful interventions included in-person group education, (seven of 12 successful studies), passive education with written educational materials (seven of 12 successful studies), technology, including texts, online lessons or smartphone applications (two of four successful studies), provider training (seven of nine successful studies) and decreased physical access to sugar-sweetened beverage increased availability of healthy beverages (two of two studies).

“Overall, to reduce [sugar-sweetened beverage] consumption among 0-year to 5-year-olds, the available evidence suggests that preschool/daycare may be important settings for interventions, and that in-person individual education, changes to the physical access of beverages and provider training are evidence-based strategies that may encourage behavior change,” the researchers wrote. “However, future research should examine the same strategies across multiple settings and populations, identify which strategies are more effective when combined together, and utilize more rigorous research methodology.”
